Introduction to the Detection and Prevention of Airborne Particulate Contaminants. A wide range of occupational exposure monitoring technologies have been used to assess occupational exposure to air contaminants. Factors influencing selection include the nature of the contaminant, the variability in levels of exposure, the status of the investigation, the availability of comparative data, and the scientific/technical abilities of the investigator. Most of the environmental contamination monitoring programs in the U.S. involve personal samplers for inhalable particulates. Personal samplers should be used for exposures below approximately 0.3 mg/m³. The determination of sampling rates for different air contaminants requires a complex statistical analysis for which little guidance is available. Only a very few national samplers 570a42141b
