I mean, I have the next simple code: `class MyClass { private: enum MyEnum { E1 = 1, E2 = 2 }; static const MyEnum myConst = E1; // ERROR: incomplete type is not allowed };` But when I compile, I get: `enu.h:14:14: error: partial definition of type 'MyClass::MyEnum'` How can I create static variable with enumeration type? A: `std::integral_constant` has a constructor that does this for you. If any argument is an enumeration type whose underlying type is an integral constant expression of the form `'= n'`, the resulting integral constant expression is the constant `'n'` if the underlying type is `int` or `unsigned int`, `'n+1'` if the underlying type is `long` or `unsigned long`, and `'n+2'` if the underlying type is `long long` or `unsigned long long`. Otherwise, the underlying type is the type of the first argument. There are also mutable versions of these `std::integral_constant::value` for Christ to take full control of these "unrede 09e8f5149f
