A: Yes, this is a common approach. You can check out the Pandas documentation on PyPI. A: I prefer 'rj' because it is designed to be interactive and a task log. The invention relates to a circuit and a method for compensating for the distortion of a signal delivered by an integrated circuit which includes at least one input and at least one output. The distortion of a signal can be compensated by providing a number of amplifiers in the loop path and by monitoring the distortion in each amplifier. Such a circuit is used, for example, in a digital interface circuit between a central unit and a digital network. The signal distortion is measured in the actual circuit by testing for example the signal distortion introduced into a continuous tone by the integrated circuit. It is an object of the invention to provide a circuit and a method which makes it possible to measure and compensate for the distortion in the integrated circuit. The circuit and method according to the invention are characterized in that a voltage value is measured in each amplifier, and that a final signal is formed by the addition of the individual voltage values. This results in an output voltage which is the sum of the voltage values and which thus represents the distortion of the input signal. Since the output signal is formed by the addition of the individual voltage values, it is not necessary to test for signal distortion in the actual circuit, but it is sufficient to test for the voltage values in the respective amplifier. This results in a simple circuit and test method for measuring the distortion of the circuit. In a preferred embodiment of the invention, the circuit is designed in such a manner that the voltage value is measured at the output of the amplifier. The invention is preferably used in a digital interface circuit, and is explained in more detail below with reference to an example. In the following example the input
