Skeletal muscle is considered as an important organ for energy homeostasis and all metabolic complications are related to disorders of glucose metabolism in this tissue. Our review will focus on skeletal muscle characteristics in type 2 diabetes mellitus (T2DM) and on the possible mechanisms involved in muscle dysfunction. Compared with nondiabetic subjects, patients with T2DM have an impairment in skeletal muscle glucose uptake and oxidation, a deficit in insulin-stimulated glucose disposal, higher levels of triglycerides, glycogen, lactate and free fatty acids in the blood, a higher expression of inflammatory genes and a reduced number of capillaries and mitochondria. In addition, these patients display a deficit in the normal oxidative capacity of skeletal muscle mitochondria, which is related to the degree of chronic hyperglycemia and which seems to be reversed by the long-term use of insulin-sensitizing drugs. A high prevalence of inactivity and/or obesity is observed in patients with T2DM. Physical inactivity is related to a skeletal muscle mitochondrial dysfunction and to the release of proinflammatory cytokines in this tissue. In contrast, obesity seems to be protective for the development of insulin resistance and is associated
