The Light in the Pane is an epic 19th-century novel by American novelist Herman Melville, often considered one of his more obscure works, due in part to its length and unusual format. It was his fifth novel, a "sequel" to Moby-Dick, which he thought was one of his best. It is generally considered one of his least successful, and perhaps none of his best-read. Although controversial in its day, the novel was not well-received by most critics, and was a commercial failure. The novel tells the story of Edwin Bolland, an uncharitable old bachelor who, on the death of his father, becomes possessed of the property on Wight's Island, where he lives, and a majority of his father's debts. In addition, he has inherited his father's terrible temper, and his strange "inordinate appetite for the task and, the finisher", a "sort of wild purpose to remove all evil" which the narrator suggests is "the insanity which grows out of a scrupulous conscientiousness, or the reverse of it--a persistent infernal conscience." The narrative structure is elliptical and mimics the form of an epic. As the plot unfolds, the apparently eccentric rambling and digressions, reminiscent of The Decameron, are gradually revealed as acts of villainy in the mounting narrative. Although the novel is full of densely allusive literary references, its themes are the fear of evil and the need to confront and destroy it. Whose body is it anyway?
