Folding of single polymer chains is one of the basic properties of proteins. However, understanding the underlying physical constraints involved in the formation of a native globular protein structure requires computationally efficient models capable of quantifying the effect of protein design on the conformational and thermodynamic stability of the resulting protein. In this article, we present a probabilistic model capable of predicting the folding landscape of proteins subject to monotonically increasing sequence lengths via a rule-based framework. The model is based on a recently introduced lattice-based framework for a stochastic, probabilistic model of protein folding. We show that the model is highly predictive of the circular restricted limit set associated with the genetic code and can identify sequences of length 13-19 that are efficiently folded into a native globular protein structure. The model also serves as a proxy for folding landscapes from other peptide-mimicking models. Our results suggest that the general evolutionary nature of the genetic code, which restricts the set of allowable amino acid (AA) pairings and thus causes sequence lengths to be capped, has led to the formation of artificial and artificial design advantages that constrain the available native fold space. In particular, these results suggest that even if there was a hierarchy of minimally competing native structures, the biased and unnecessary nature of the genetic code would necessitate a restricted circular limit set that imposes a limit on the allowable sequences. The results also highlight the importance of considering a restricted limit set in explaining the unique characteristics of the restricted circular limit set associated with the genetic code.
