websitesQ: Does mongodb preserve the order of the results when using distinct? Say I run the following query to distinct all docs by the total field and all mongodb returns: `db.getCollection('collection').distinct('total')` Does it return each result set as they were added to the collection? And if so how can I force it to return all the results in sorted order?
I'm assuming that I can't use the $orderby and $sort operators as my documents may change order very often. A: Yes, by default, MMS will preserve ordering. However, there are a couple of caveats: MMS supports the sort() method on the cursor returned by Distinct(). It also supports the orderBy() method on an aggregation pipeline, though this is not directly exposed to users. The version of MMS that comes with MongoDB will only honor the `sort()` method. However, other versions of the MMS driver support both. If you're really worried about this, you could write a driver to build your own cursor, or implement your own aggregation pipeline that uses `orderBy()`.

Breaking the MVC pattern from within an MVC Looking for a clear explanation. The MVC pattern is all about classifying business logic into its own class, containing all the non-UI related logic - such as validation etc. (as such things should be used explicitly by the View(s) and Controller). Let's say, however, I want to do the same thing, but from within a View - specifically, the Model data is presented to the View in a fairly complex data structure (for example, my business logic doesn't know how to handle it). Consider this:

// Somewhere in the class for the View var someData; function passTheDataToTheView(){ // Do something with the data var view = new View(theData); // Do something with the view } where the "View" is my class which includes all the UI related logic (positioning, drawing etc.) and the View also contains all the code to display the data it contains in the correct way. Should I then implement this in my View "class", using inheritance, e.g: function doSomethingSpecial(){ // do something with the data } function passTheDataToTheView(){ // Do something with the data var view = new View(theData); // Do something with the view doSomethingSpecial() } Or should I break it down further, do something with the data and pass it on to the proper method in the View, i.e: // Somewhere in the class for the View var

someData; function
passTheDataToTheView(){ // do something
with the data var view = new View(theData
