Something like: unsigned int getLowBits(unsigned int bits) { unsigned int result; //Check if bits have a mask if((bits&((unsigned int)0xffff)) == 0) { result = bits; } else { //Get the first bit of bits //???? result =???? } return result; } A: Assuming the 2's complement representation, you can take the highest order bit and the low order 8 bits and shift that to the bit position of the result that you want. Then add the appropriate masks to get the correct bit positions. So: bits > 8) ||| result = (bits >> 24) & 0xff; Assuming the representation of the integer is bit order is significant, the mask to get the low 8 bits is 0xff000000, so the mask for the high order bits is 0x00ff0000. For your 9th bit, it is just a mask of 0x09000000. If the order of the bits are not significant, then, of course, each bit position of the mask can be set to 0xff separately, and you can use whichever of the 0xff masks you need. The only hard part is to know what the masks will be
