Employers Mutual of Wausau for the proposition that when an employee sustains a compensable workplace injury, the employee is only entitled to workers' compensation benefits that are attributable to the injury. The majority states that its "decision is further constrained by the general rule that indemnification is allowed against a carrier only if the employer would be liable to the third party in question." The majority then notes that it would not allow an independent contractor to proceed against its own negligent employer in a contractual indemnity action. I believe that the majority is misinterpreting the law on third party and contractual indemnity. First, I am not suggesting that the injured employee should lose his claim to workers' compensation benefits simply because a third party is liable for damages to the employee. In fact, I have never stated that when an employee sustains a compensable injury he loses his entitlement to workers' compensation benefits when a third party is held liable for damages. But I am suggesting that the employee should be entitled to all of the damages awarded for his injuries. Second, I do not question the right
