The trip to Kaoshiung, in southern Taiwan, takes place in early September, the Chinese-language edition of the newspaper reports. The South China Morning Post's report says that the South Koreans are looking at the locations of up to 20 nuclear reactors, and is also interested in the plant's design and how it is linked to the plant's extensive external power supply system. The news is the first evidence of interest in China's third largest nuclear power company by capacity in the country. Nuclear power has increased rapidly across China in recent years, with five of the country's 34 commercial nuclear reactors under construction or in progress as of the end of 2014. Moreover, China plans to further increase the number of nuclear power reactors by 2022, when the country aims to increase its installed capacity to 100 GW. The Chinese government also wants to raise nuclear power capacity to about 200 GW, while still reaching its goal of expanding coal capacity to about 1,100 GW. Coal made up 69.3 percent of China's total generating capacity by the end of 2014, according to the China Electricity Council (CEC). The changing Chinese policy on nuclear power is one of the big differences in the country's energy future. In the 1990s, nuclear power was championed, but after the Fukushima disaster in Japan in 2011, the Chinese government suspended approvals of new nuclear plants in China and expanded safety requirements across the country's industry. China's Nuclear Regulatory Commission has since approved 24 new nuclear plants since the start of 2013, and the country is expected to approve four more reactors at the end of the year. The government also plans to build many more units by 2025, which is roughly the same time when the government wants to increase the country's installed capacity for coal power to 1,100 GW. Nowadays, though, the Chinese
