At first, I had a global array which was filled on a separate thread, then iterated through the array of data in the console window thread. The whole thing worked, but I want to move towards higher security standards. The documentation for working with C++11 threads is sparse, so I am looking for general advice and some good examples. #include #include #include #include #include #define NUM_ITERATIONS 20000 int numberOfGroups = 3; int numberOfElements = 3; float distance = 1.0; std::vector data; using namespace std::chrono_literals; void serialFillData(int numOfGroups, int numOfElements) { vector fillThread

I've recently seen a sample of hosted Firebase Cloud Functions, where they pass in a manifest_name to the authChallenge handler in their cloud functions. What is this argument for? Is it there to support for generation of JSON Web Tokens on the server that are verified for authentication? A: The manifest_name argument is in Firebase Hosting for the same reason it is in regular Firebase Functions. The manifest is a file that contains metadata about the Firebase hosting environment, and the Firebase tools need this information in order to do their work. If you are looking for more information on the manifest, you can take a look at the Firebase Hosting documentation. Q: Why [TypeScript.org] should be added as synonym of [typescript] I use haskell.org. In that wiki, I found about Types and semantics in Haskell. Then, I found about TypeScript. Its URL is which I found similar with type. I thought it's coincidence, but I found out [typescript] was actually synonym of [TypeScript.org]. Why this difference? What is the difference of this page? A: This is not a wiki issue, but a branding issue. On the typescript website, they assume that you are reading and writing TypeScript. That's why they call it TypeScript.org. The homepage has always been here. On the other hand, on the Haskell.org, they assume that you are reading and writing Haskell. That's why they call it haskell.org 82138339de
