The aim of this study was to evaluate whether nutrient intake alters the survival of advanced cancer patients. Forty patients with advanced cancer were evaluated. Nutrient intakes were assessed by a 3-day dietary recall and compared with the recommended dietary allowances for Thai adults. Nutrient intakes were compared between survivors and nonsurvivors. Correlation coefficients were calculated between dietary intakes and changes in body mass index (BMI). At 1-year follow-up, 11% of patients were alive, and the median survival time for all patients was 10 months. The median intakes of energy, protein, vitamin D, calcium, potassium, fiber, and iron were significantly lower than the reference values. The median nutrient intakes did not differ significantly between survivors and nonsurvivors. Among all nutrients studied, potassium intake had the strongest association with BMI ($r = 0.366$, $p = 0.020$). There was no significant correlation between any nutrient and survival. Advanced cancer patients had lower energy, protein, calcium, potassium, vitamin D, and fiber intakes than the reference values. Their survival was not significantly associated with these nutrients. However, potassium intake was related to survival. Nutritional care to address this problem should be part of the usual care program for advanced cancer patients.DC's A-List - Anthem stars - Parvez Tehrani Oh, my god, he's right here, in our section! 3e33713323
