[Glenoid version and anterior glenohumeral translation: clinical and radiographic evaluation]. The objective of the study was to evaluate the radiographic relationship between glenoid version and anterior glenohumeral translation (AGHT). The authors evaluated the scapular Glenoid version and the translation of the anterior glenohumeral joint with regard to the surgical and non surgical treatment of the anterior instability. The study included 26 elite male handball athletes with unilateral anterior instability and 10 elite male handball players without shoulder instability and 11 asymptomatic male handball athletes. The scapula was evaluated in all three positions: with the arm abducted to 90° and the scapula parallel to the floor, with the arm abducted to 90° and adducted, and with the arm neutral and the scapula perpendicular to the floor. Glenoid version was significantly more anterior in the non-injured shoulder in both the symptomatic and asymptomatic groups ($p = 0.03$, $p = 0.007$, respectively). The translation of the anterior glenohumeral joint was significantly more anterior in the non-injured shoulder in both groups of the symptomatic and asymptomatic groups ($p = 0.000$, $p = 0.000$, respectively). We found that the more the glenoid version is anterior, the greater the translation of the anterior glenohumeral joint in the non-injured shoulder. Even though we did not find a significant correlation between superior labrum anterior posterior lesions and AGHT, they must not be ignored.Effect of diet on iron metabolism in chronic renal failure patients.
