The disclosed subject matter may relate to a presently known motor. However, it is to be appreciated that the present invention may be applicable to any electric motor to a greater or lesser degree. Electric motors typically include a stator and a rotor. The stator is formed from an outer wall and a plurality of coils of a conductor disposed in the wall. In this configuration, the stator forms the outer wall of the motor. The rotor is generally situated within the stator and also includes a plurality of coils of a conductor. The rotor may be formed of iron, steel, or another material. The rotor may rotate about a central axis relative to the stator so as to move a component that may be actuated by the rotation of the rotor. The rotor may rotate at high speed, which may cause the rotor to heat significantly. Consequently, cooling the rotor is typically required to ensure that the rotor does not overheat. In one type of motor, the rotor is rotatably supported within the stator by a bearing. The bearing supports the rotor so that the rotor does not contact the stator, which may assist in preventing damage to the stator caused by the contact. An example of such a motor is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 4,269,702 to Quigley. Quigley discloses a motor including a stator and a rotor rotatably supported by three balls. During operation of the motor, each of the three balls is positioned at the interface between the rotor and stator so as to support the rotor and prevent damage to the stator. The rotor may be cooled by circulating a cooling fluid from an opening at a center of the rotor through a second opening in the stator
