countries Juliane Kempf and Prakash Sakpal This paper argues for the need to revisit the assumption that countries rely on large inflows of foreign direct investment (FDI) to achieve economic growth. This assumption is used to justify many policies that have been put in place by international donors over the last decade or so. We investigate the justification for the focus on FDI for economic growth and argue that this is neither an adequate justification nor a realistic goal for many developing countries. We also argue that the existing policies to promote FDI, such as eligibility of foreign direct investment for 'automatic' approval from the Finance Ministry, distort the markets and make it more difficult for others to enter the market. As a consequence, we call for reducing dependence on FDI and for a more flexible regulatory framework for FDI, including the ability for market participants to choose the preferred legal regime for investment. Such a change in policy may serve to increase the ability of private firms to carry out activities in a more localised manner, reducing the need for formal (state-controlled) enterprises, and reducing the role of the public sector in general, which is counterproductive to the development goals of many developing countries. We provide a brief description of the rationale underlying the policy to promote FDI as a catalyst for economic growth. We also introduce a large-scale empirical study, which tries to investigate if countries with a less transparent system of regulatory permissions for FDI, as compared to countries with a more transparent system, have achieved the goals of economic growth. It is argued that a more open (and experimental) approach to FDI may give rise to better long-term investment and more sustainable economic growth for developing countries, in line with economic growth theory. A key feature of this investigation is the use of
