How can I make "execute_sql" usable in several classes? I have a model like this: class MyModel def execute_sql(sql_params) if active_record? super(sql_params.merge(@config[:search] || {}).to_query.merge(api_params)) else raise NotActiveRecord end end end I want MyModel.execute_sql(params) to be used in both active_record and non active_record mode. But this code always get first super version of execute_sql from parent class. What am I doing wrong? Thank you very much. A: After reading your question and comments on my answer

Divine Divinity Crack + With Product Key 2022

This game starts with the narrator, describing the condition of the volcano as it's been over a year since the last eruption. Players then receive their quest: "A strange story is told of the ancient world. It is said that in the deepest caverns of the earth, near an ancient volcano, dwell the witches of the snow. On the anniversary of their evil deeds, a deathly chill falls on the land. It is said that the witches have cursed this land for all time." Players must go into these caverns and uncover the cause of the chilling winds. Throughout the game, players will encounter dragons, giant snow trolls, and monsters such as the Emerald Scarlet Witch and the Night Shadow Dragon. If you want to be on the safe side, you can follow the Game's in-universe narrator, Dred. He offers hints, and in the final section of the game, you need to locate three artifacts to conclude the quest. Gameplay: It's fast. It's fun. The game is very much like one of those old Moldatschimp games. As you would remember them from 1985, they're sort of like adventure books where you get a set of basic rules and then you draw the map. The dungeons are just like that, except you have a few rules and instructions. You draw out a map and then draw a single path to the rest of the dungeons. Players are given simple descriptions to help them figure out the lay of the land. The goal is simple: go down to the bottom of the lava hole, fight the ice troll, and free the Witch. To figure out where all the monsters are located, you can listen to the narrator or look at the dungeon map. You can also navigate through the dungeons via a simple cursor interface. At the bottom of the dungeon, there is a cave entrance to another cavern. In this new cavern, there are dragons, giant snow trolls, and the next set of three treasure caves. If you have the artifacts, you can reach the "true end." In each of the dungeons, you need to kill an ice troll and steal its "Witch's Clothing" before moving on to the next area. Players also need to collect a heart, which is dropped by some of the monsters. There are eggs that turn into dragons in this dungeon. If you happen

What's new in Divine Divinity:

Pareidolia is the tendency to perceive familiar patterns or images in things that are unusual or unfamiliar. Origin and definition Pareidolia is a term coined by 18th-century German ethnologist Johann David Schoepff in 1795, to describe the perceived imperfection of handmade objects. Contemporary usage When she was a schoolgirl, psychologist Eleanor Rosch noticed that she and other children would see faces in inanimate objects or inscriptions they read. She reported her findings to her parents in the early 1960s, rather to their surprise, since they did not consider faces to be a common phenomenon. Some persons assume that their dreams reflect their subconscious motives and states of mind, and are rarely aware of having recognized faces in their dreams, finding it hard to say why they dreamed such faces. In the book Oh, Really! by the American psychologist Armin Brott, many different stories were told by the authors' acquaintances about things appearing in their dreams. Some of these people believed their dreams reflected subconscious feelings, and others believed that they saw allusions to themselves or events in their lives. It appeared that the latter possibility was much more common, and contributed to the development of the concept of pareidolia. A 1999 academic paper that analyzed 519 studies of the perception of faces in inanimate objects found that the critical variable that resulted in better perception of faces was increased familiarity. Investigations of face pareidolia have also indicated that the face is the most likely type of figure to be recognized. Other features, such as the head, gaze, and hair, may be recognized instead, but are nearly as common. Faces, in contrast, are rarer, but the rarity cannot explain their uncanny tendency to be perceived. There are also higher rates of detection of faces than any other stimulus, due to the face's uniqueness and special cognitive and neural processing. Psychologists and artists regard the relation between pareidolia and memory as being similar to that of symbolism. The painting Venus Repentant by Caravaggio is a common example of this. The near-perfect resemblance between the missing hand of the naked statue of the goddess and her reattached right hand has been noted by critics as similar to a runic symbol for "evil". Thus, the vision has been interpreted as one's recall of an impression from early life. A 2005 study of people suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), published in the
