There is no doubt that the leading research universities are an important part of the solution to the problems of mass un- and under-education. Many view them as the stuff of left-wing ideals - schools where the administration preaches social justice and teaches New Age philosophy. The truth is that the leading research universities are not only fiercely competitive, but also rigorous in their standards - it is a place where genius is rewarded, where people come to test their wits and to challenge themselves against those who have dedicated their lives to the pursuit of knowledge. In the process, they also develop deeply ingrained habits of hard-nosed academic rigor. The resulting effect of all this is to create a working population which is well-educated in every sense. In Theses on the Current State of the University, the American philosopher Daniel Dennett has come up with a very useful analysis of the difference between universities which thrive, and those which don't. He makes a distinction between "the University" and "the Academy" - the former being the playground of clever students who seek to gain admission and then bluff their way through courses designed for those who have what it takes to be enrolled - students who think with their hats on. The "Academy" is supposed to be the place where all the very talented students graduate. Here is Dennett's description of the differences: "Though their primary function is to educate, the universities are not the only places of education in the life of a community. The universities are excellent places to learn how to be educated; more often than not, they can teach you which subjects are important and which aren't; but the art of the intellectual is hardly a neat science that they can teach you. No, the universities are not the only places of learning in the life of a community; they are not even necessarily the best places. They teach the necessary skills for being educated, but not necessarily how to learn. For knowledge, they can only teach you how to think; and there are other places for that." Dennett is interested in the philosophical implications of education - how the kinds of people you
