Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg has been a visible figure in the fight against structural racism, particularly in the criminal justice system. At the recent SXSW festival in Texas she spoke of the arrest of her teenage cousin at a Jim Crow-era drive-in theatre. Knowing that racial injustice affected him her as their cousin, she spoke about her own experiences of false arrest, wrongful accusation and mistreatment. This personal connection to the justice system's treatment of black and Latino people is an important reason to support her nomination, but Ginsburg's experience is not unique. Get familiar. Read all the articles in the series. Check out the bib. Visit EvidenceNetwork.org to get started. Featured on the website, in this roundup are articles by Ginsburg, new members of the court, and legal academics and practitioners at leading institutions and public interest organizations. The articles were selected based on their quality, innovation and timely relevance to the nomination. A full summary with links to the articles can be found here. In our first piece, SF Weekly's Tamara Draut explores the ongoing fight by United Van Lines — a moving company — for inclusion of the LGBT community as a protected class: But the protections, the company argues, unfairly single out certain vulnerable groups. "Some 'protected classes' — like race, religion, national origin and gender — are clearly not enjoyed by everyone," its lawyers write in court filings. "United's policy of excluding gays from housing benefits goes too far." Of the five justices up for the seat of retiring justice Anthony Kennedy, three are straight or married and two are women. In our second article, P.L. Yu, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, explains the path to Trump's Supreme Court: The battle for the Supreme Court vacancy will now shift to confirmation hearings, beginning next month. However, Trump still has a significant degree of ground to make up.
