Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to a power source system for use in a DC motor and, more particularly, to a power source system which includes a DC motor and a low voltage battery connected to a power source receptacle of a building. 2. Description of the Related Art In general, power consumption by peripheral equipment, such as a hard disk drive, which requires large amount of power to operate, is low and it is difficult to continuously drive the power supply of the hard disk drive. Thus, a power source of the hard disk drive is often from a low voltage battery, such as a battery pack, which is connected to the hard disk drive by a jumper cable. Such a power source system includes a DC motor and a low voltage battery. The DC motor is connected to a power source receptacle of a building and also connected to the low voltage battery via a jumper cable. The power source system of the DC motor and the low voltage battery requires that the jumper cable is properly routed to properly connect the DC motor and the low voltage battery so that the low voltage battery is suitably charged. However, as described above, the power supply of the hard disk drive is often from the low voltage battery, which is connected to the power source receptacle of the building by a jumper cable. Thus, the jumper cable that is used to connect the DC motor and the low voltage battery of the power source system must cross through the ceiling of the building and consequently require a relatively large space. In addition, the jumper cable should be adapted to move between the power source receptacle of the building and the DC motor, and power lines connected to the DC motor should be secured and positioned to be readily accessible. Consequently, the power source system of the DC motor and the low voltage battery is susceptible to being disconnected during
