series of punches led. A new study from Vanderbilt University finds that simulating speaking lessons and learning a foreign language reduces divorce rates. Dr. Simeon Rose, Dr. John Costello and their team examined the impact of additional language study before and after marriage on the likelihood that a couple would end up divorcing.

They reviewed data from 6,000 couples who signed a marriage contract in Quebec between 1971 and 1975 and then completed an 11-item questionnaire as to whether they thought a divorce was likely in the future, if they planned to leave the marriage, if their marriage failed as a result of something they did, or if their marriage ended because of something their spouse did. About 5 percent of couples who took the marriage-counseling course studied abroad reported thinking about or planning to divorce, compared with 8 percent of couples who were placed in a control group that either studied before the marriage or made no additional study effort. But only 2 percent of couples who studied abroad said their marriage failed because of something they did, compared with 4 percent of couples who did not study abroad but lived in another country. Study participants were also tested to assess their ability to read and speak French, a key component of the program. The researchers found that couples who studied before marriage and then lived abroad for an extended period of time who had the opportunity to study French while abroad were half as likely to think about, start or end a divorce as couples who only studied or lived before marriage. “When you place couples in an experiment, one spouse controls the study conditions of the other and can manipulate her. To our knowledge, this is
