Frozen Stars is primarily a one-setting game set in the fictitious world of Maru, where the dice are always dice. One hundred years ago, magic was forbidden, and the magic-tainted mages of Maru have been living in the interior since that time. Many people believe this is a long-forgotten land, yet the medicine wheel is still around. There are hard-working farmers and artists, and the once uniform schools have become more diverse now that there are more places to live. It's always been said that those who live in the interior are protected from the storms, and that they get power from the sun. Yet the townsfolk near the coast complain that the long-dried local river never floods, even though there are no more offerings to the solar gods. These people only visit the coast if they need a ride or wish to trade wares. While one might ask why a hard-working farm community with good trade would be unable to get any supplies in the months they're away from their home village, observers claimed that outsiders do not understand their natural culture and traditions. The local people can even see the global tower; like thin white lines skimming the rocky landscape. Most don't dare to step out of their caves to see the fortress looming over their town. Yet some say that the global tower was there well before they ever came to Maru.
