The Void Rush is a fast paced action racer where you have to jump on a big red platform and collect as many speed boosts as possible while avoiding all the obstacles that block your path. You can pick up power-ups if you successfully complete the stunt by landing on them. Be prepared for a close encounter with obstacles and watch out for the voids that will change your direction and your destination. You can replay the stages and earn more speed boosts and precious seconds, so every minute you get on the level is well spend. The game features an interesting storyline and a unique soundtrack created by acclaimed game musician Nimue Bassett. This is the first Void Rush game on iPhone and iPad! Silos, and other types of grain storage containers, are used to help protect grain from pests, or to store grain when a crop is harvested. In this process, grain enters silos from bulk bins. Silos can be stacked in various ways: for example, a two-story silo with granary above and warehouse below. Silos are sometimes architecturally distinguished by features such as a pyramid-roof, a corbelled roof, or vertical sloping side walls that are used to assist in stacking. The earliest use of silos appears to be in Mesopotamia during the 4th millennium BC. Early 5th-century Chinese documents describe several types of wooden silos; later documents describe tubular clay silos. History Domestic storage Grain was originally stored in mud-baked pits in early agricultural civilizations. The ancient Egyptians made use of these pits to store surplus grain and beer for use in times of emergency. Cities such as Thebes and Memphis would produce sufficient grain during the summer to store for the winter, as excess was sometimes, but not always, set aside for priests to be used in religious ceremonies and festivals. Holes were sometimes bored into the sides of pits to admit excess grain. The walls of these pits were sometimes covered with bricks and rubble. Silos were first used in ancient Egypt to help protect grain from the destructive insects and pests that thrive in open air conditions, particularly in hot and dry climates. Storage pits were sometimes built in or near the houses of the poor. Some of these storage spaces were stucco-lined to slow down the deterioration of the stored grain. The walls of some silos were lined with bricks to prevent the grain from being contaminated by insects, dirt, or humidity. Coptic c9d1549cdd

I do this because it's something I wish I could do more of, and I wish I could do it for others. --Jeff November 2014 Update: Thanks to the suggestions from viewers, I've added a climate change section to the update. I hope you all enjoy the changes! (also check out my podcast, "Spy Rundown") I'm Jonathan Schildhorn, and I'll be your host for this week's Action Obsessed. I'm a big fan of games that involve shooting things (specifically aliens, robots, and large animals) and when I discovered that one particular game existed where you could do just that, I was quite enthused. So when the game was brought to my attention, I decided to watch the review and if it was any good, I'd pick up the game. The game is called Discs of Tranquility, and I enjoyed the play-through about as much as one could possibly enjoy a game that involves shooting things at high speeds. The review I watched was done by the guy that plays the game here on Youtube. He's not only a good guy, but he's also a world class and very entertaining comedian. So with that said, if you're wondering if you should purchase Discs of Tranquility, well, I can give you my opinion. This game is... It's... It's... I'm not really sure how to describe it, so I'll just say it's pretty good. It's pretty fun, and it has some pretty cool unique aspects that aren't often seen in this style of game. For example, the game not only involves shooting things, but it also has vehicles. There are three different vehicles, and the type you'll use varies depending on the mission, but they all have their benefits. For instance, if you were to choose to drive the car first, you'd be able to look around, and you can also use the... See the guy on the side of the screen? Yeah, he's laughing.
