One form of the sudden onset fatiguing illness often seen in office workers is termed "telework syndrome" and is characterized by a self-reported decrease in subjective alertness and ability to concentrate during prolonged hours at the workplace. The finding of prolonged episodes of sickness absence due to depression and tension headache or psychosomatic illness during the late working day suggests that a feature of this syndrome may be vestibular impairment. Previous investigations of prolonged work periods (Sawin, 1974a) have shown that prolonged exposure to unpredictable surroundings or work performed during sleep-wake cycles may deplete the vestibular system through pathophysiological mechanisms. To test the hypothesis that an objectively measurable degree of vestibular impairment may develop during prolonged work periods, we used a visually guided repetitive horizontal sinusoidal and a 20 degrees vertical sinusoidal target tracking task using a two-dimensional target monitor. In a counterbalanced design, a group of 11 office workers were seated for 10 min, then stood for 40 min and then again sat for 10 min. The measurement of the visually induced postural instability was made in a controlled laboratory situation by the use of the vestibular system. Subjects wore a belt with position sensors and a surface electromyography (EMG) electrode was attached to the hip and erector spinae. The subjects maintained the target within a line superimposed on the surface of the screen through a repetitive series of small adjustments. In both the horizontal and vertical planes, adaptation was considerable, and the d0c515b9f4
