When To Start a Startup - theckld ===== juriga There are several misconceptions in this article. I am not a startup person either, so this is how I would do it: 1\ Do it if you are a person who loves to start something, always wanting to build/improve something. You need to enjoy working on it. If you don't understand what you are doing, you will probably feel trapped and or frustrated because you are not able to use your current knowledge and skills to achieve something you are a fan of. 2\ Start a startup if you have an idea of something to build. If you have knowledge of something, or can do something, you should just do it! 3\ Start a startup if you have no clue what you are doing, but you think something could be useful and people would be willing to pay for it. That's one of the reason why there are so many startup attempts. The world is full of people who think they would be able to do something, but are totally wrong. 4\ Do it if you are a person who likes to try out different things. Maybe you have a hobby of reading research papers, and you really want to get involved into writing. Maybe you read a research paper on something that looks really interesting, and you would like to try it out. You do not have a clear idea of how to do it, but you think maybe the founders who wrote the paper might be able to help you with getting started. ----- falk Although not a startup, I have a pet project that I started with friends of mine. The project was originally to help you construct a product feature specification based on empirical data collected from your users. It's an online tool that works like a prototype or web mock-up for your product. It's called Socratic - [The code is open source at [It's free to use (unlike some sites that sell customization and features), and it generates some revenue from monitoring Google Analytics. ---- vinitool76 s
