In a joint statement, AMA President Dr Stephen Strahan and College of Psychiatrists President Professor Helen Rowlands said the current crisis was one of the greatest challenges to face humanity since the height of the Spanish Flu pandemic in 1918. "The mental health of the most vulnerable in our community should be at the forefront of the mind of all emergency and health services, including the mental health response to COVID-19," the statement said. "Children and young people are particularly vulnerable during this unprecedented time, as well as people experiencing homelessness, people with mental illness or intellectual disabilities and, of course, older people. "The mental health response will need to be appropriately targeted to ensure that all our people, their families and communities are supported in a way that ensures that the current crisis does not make any people more vulnerable than they already are. "This includes strong preventative strategies, ensuring that medical services are appropriately resourced to provide quality care and minimising the risk of hospitalisation and other service overuse," the statement said. "It is crucial that services are resourced sufficiently to support carers and primary carers to look after their own mental health as well as keeping elder people at home, carers in the workplace, and children at school." Additionally, community-based services that support the mental health of children and families, including school-based and health service providers, also needed to be safe and resilient and to continue to operate. In all of these services, it was essential that the needs of all people were met in a timely and effective manner. The statement also called for the Government to immediately introduce National Mental Health Pandemic Plans in all states and territories to coordinate and guide health and mental health services in the period of the COVID-19 outbreak and its aftermath. The Mental Health Commission must be given the responsibility for monitoring these plans. ♦
