Q: Getting a list of files from Google Drive in PHP I am trying to get a list of files from Google drive in PHP. This is how I get the list (with id, title etc): `$request = $service->files->listFiles(array('q' => 'id, title, files(id, title)'));` and this is how I count the number of files: `$request = $service->files->listFiles(array('q' => 'id, title, files(id, title)')); if (count($request->getItems()) > 0) { foreach ($request->getItems() as $file) { $item = new Google_DriveFile(); $item->setId($file->getId()); $item->setTitle($file->getTitle()); $item->setMimeType($file->getMimeType()); $item->setDescription($file->getDescription()); $item->setThumbnailUrl($file->getThumbnailUrl()); $files[] = $item; } }` The problem is that `listFiles` is supposed to return the files in reverse order so that files are added to the list from the latest to the oldest. Therefore, after using it one time, I store in `$files` all the ids of the files. When I call it a second time (to count the number of files in the folder), the files are ordered from the latest to the oldest. For instance, I have two files in that folder: 1.03.06.2014 and 1.09.11.2014. The first is at the top of the folder and the second one is at the bottom. When I get the list using `listFiles`, the files are returned in that order, which is the opposite of how I would like it to be. When I call `listFiles` a second time, the files are ordered from the latest to the oldest. Does anybody know why? Or how can I get them in the correct order? A: I solved it by using `$request = $service->files->list()` instead. Add

Contents Managing Data in the Cloud In certain cases, you may need to manage a small amount of data (e.g. a contact list) on a server in your home or office. For example, if you are working from home, you may need to connect your computer to a network in your home or office, and share your music or photos with colleagues or family members. This is also true if you use free disk-based file storage at home, such as Microsoft's OneDrive or Google's Google Drive. When you do this, you are creating an instance of your data on a server in the cloud—that is, a server outside your home or office. (Technically, these instances of your data are called "instances" or "container" instances, because they are instances of your data). For example, when you use OneDrive, and access the files in your folder on the OneDrive website, OneDrive creates an instance of your data at a designated web address, and sends a copy of your data to the server. When you connect your computer to a network, the operating system on your computer makes a copy of your data, and stores it in a "file system." The file system on your computer stores your data; your data is not stored on the network. Connected to a network, your computer or your devices can send and receive data as soon as it is sent and received by the network. Your files and folders are stored in your computer's file system. The other side of the story: What if you need to upload a large number of files to the Internet? Say you have a folder of 1000 files. Instead of downloading these files one at a time and placing them in one of your hard drives, you can upload all 1000 files to OneDrive at once. When you connect your computer to a network, the operating system on your computer makes a copy of your data, and stores it in a file system. The file system on your computer stores your data; your data is not stored on the network.
