He told the court he would see the defendant the following day at 10 o'clock in the forenoon and notified the police. The defendant, who was arrested later, denied any wrongdoing. In People v. Smith, 89 Cal.App. 460 [265 P. 190] a similar situation arose. The defendant was known by the officers to be a dangerous criminal who was often in trouble and was shortly thereafter seen in a street market known to the police as a place where they knew large quantities of narcotics were sold and used. The police ascertained the defendant was selling the narcotics. The police officer summoned the defendant to the police station where the defendant was booked for a narcotics violation. He admitted selling a half ounce of heroin and a quantity of morphine but he denied any knowledge of the sale of a narcotic drug in the street market to which he had gone. Later, the defendant told the police that he had bought the narcotics in the market and had been bribed by another person who had originally sold the narcotics. There is no doubt that the defendant violated the narcotics laws in selling the drugs to the police b7e8fdf5c8
