To investigate whether the increasing incidence of abdominal hysterectomy with increasing age is explained by rising risk of dying from surgical conditions after hysterectomy, or whether the higher risk of surgical conditions after hysterectomy reflects higher rates of comorbidity at older ages. National inpatient register and vital statistics register. Women who had a hysterectomy with intact vaginal cuff. Kaplan-Meier methods were used to estimate survival after hysterectomy. Cox proportional hazards models were used to estimate hazard ratios (HRs) for cause-specific mortality. Two thousand seven hundred and fifty-three women (7.4% of all hysterectomy cases). Surgical site infection (5.4%), pulmonary embolism (1.0%) and postoperative ileus (1.2%) were the most common surgical conditions. In total, 36 deaths occurred (1.5%) after hysterectomy. For both women and men, increased risk of death after hysterectomy was greatest in young ages and was no longer evident at ages older than 64 years. Age was a strong and independent predictor of mortality. The increased risk of death after hysterectomy was largely explained by surgical conditions. Both for women and men, the increased risk of death was limited to ages below 64 years. Whether in young ages surgery is the cause of death or part of the dying process cannot be determined from this study.Q: Android - What is this error and what does it mean?
