But the giant truck is actually made of smaller units that are then all welded together. As the team get to work, making up a giant vehicle, Professor Ludwig observes: "We don't see this as a giant machine, we see it as lots of little units bolted together. "It's the whole of the United Kingdom pulling the boat from Perth, and the actual sea-going vessel is far too small. "It's like a giant king-size duvet." As for the parts that make up the giant beast, Professor Ludwig says it's not quite quite as simple as that either.

"The bottom end of the truck is actually made of a fraction of the components. "Then they have to be welded together before it even gets rolled out of our workshops."

The truck itself takes around three to four weeks to complete. Once it's all finished the team from TAS are very proud of their giant truck and say they've actually got a couple of teething problems as well. "For example we're not expecting rain until the middle of January, so we have to wait for the weather to improve. "Also, it tends to be windy on the longest leg of the journey - we're now into the main wind region of the North Atlantic, so it's not quite so friendly." Professor Ludwig says he has no particular plans for his giant truck, whether it's travelling around the world or over the North Atlantic. "The idea of the truck was to make a useful and memorable piece of work. It's mainly a sculpture, it's not a real truck. It's
