Validated Doppler US method and transcranial Doppler ultrasound for determination of cerebral hemodynamic parameters in patients with isolated severe subarachnoid hemorrhage. The aim of this study was to assess the reliability of the newly proposed, validated Doppler ultrasound (US) transcranial Doppler ultrasonography method in patients with isolated severe subarachnoid hemorrhage (SAH). We performed Doppler US on 27 patients with recently diagnosed severe SAH. The hemodynamic parameters of the cerebral arteries ipsilateral and contralateral to the initial hemorrhage were measured using the newly proposed, validated method with the Neuroson Q series Q-1000 Ultrasound System and compared with transcranial Doppler (TCD) US. We also compared the clinical data in the patient and control groups. The agreement between the Doppler US and TCD US measurements was almost perfect in almost all arterial segments, with an intraclass correlation coefficient of 0.985. No significant difference (P
