are commonly used in warehouse environments to facilitate the flow of goods and materials. Warehouse workers often need to monitor the flow of materials within the warehouse. Warehouse workers often use a conveyor belt to store or move the materials. Conveyors often have multiple conveyor sections that are monitored to detect the flow of materials through the conveyor. A conveyor problem occurs when a material drops in a section of the conveyor that is not monitored. When conveyor system personnel find the drop, the affected section of the conveyor must be disassembled in order to make the material flow through the monitored sections. This process is time consuming and is often costly as the upstream conveyor sections are often used to convey goods or materials for sale. The disassembly of the conveyor requires trained personnel to resolve the conveyor problem. Accordingly, a need remains for a conveyor system that automatically detects a drop on a conveyor and transmits a signal to a warehouse administrator when the drop is detected. Clinical and quantitative data obtained from measurements in vitro and in vivo are compared to evaluate the biomechanical parameters of the arthrodesis of the cervical spine. The course of the flexion movements of the head in the fusion operation are generally restricted in the atlanto-odontoid joint (a-o-j). The mobilisation of this a-o-j causes a lengthening of the odontoid. The stabilisation of the a-o-j mainly takes place by the effects of the flexor muscles acting on this joint and the effects of the ligaments. The mobility of the a-o-j differs within the immobilised patient with and without symptoms, and with an orthosis. These effects can be registered quantitatively. The visualisation of the physiological distribution of the muscles using ultrasound gives additional insight into the effect of the stabilisation. Severe hyperkalaemia in a patient with primary hyperoxaluria caused by a novel mutation in the AGXT2 gene. Primary hyperoxaluria (PH) is an inborn error of metabolism resulting in oxalate-induced nephrocalcinosis (NC), renal failure and increased incidence of urolithiasis. The condition is caused by deficiencies in hepatic enzyme alanine-glyoxylate aminotransferase (AGT), resulting in impaired catabolism of glycine and in oxalate (OC) excretion. The two distinct AGT deficiencies are caused by mutations in the AGXT1 or AGXT2 gene. Heterozygotes can survive in the presence of a relatively low OC load, in contrast to the affected homozygotes, who rapidly develop life-threatening hyperoxaluria and renal failure. We present the case of a 3-month-old girl with PH and biallelic mutations in the AGXT2 gene. Hyperkalaemia occurred despite normal serum and urine oxal
