An audio interface for a computer is a major component of a digital recording system. One type of digital recording system is a compact disk recorder. The digital recording system is capable of recording audio and/or video information onto the compact disk. The analog signal from the microphone is converted into digital signals by an analog-to-digital converter prior to being recorded. The digital information is transferred to the compact disk by a disk drive after the information has been encoded. The information is then transferred to the computer by an appropriate interface. The user can then utilize the audio and video information from the compact disk for various purposes. Currently, a number of interface modules exist for the above mentioned system. One of the major advantages of these existing interface modules is that they can be utilized by a wide variety of computers. The major drawbacks are that they take up valuable space and do not permit the user to monitor audio and/or video information while it is being recorded. Furthermore, the existing interface modules do not monitor and perform automatic gain control (AGC) of the input source. When recording video, it is important that the video information be recorded on the compact disk at a constant volume and, as a result, the various levels in the video information have to be controlled. If the audio level varies too much, the audio portion will be distorted when the video signal is later transferred to the computer. Prior art interface modules have a constant gain and do not control the audio level. With the above in mind, a need exists for a more versatile interface module for a digital recording system.
