Positron-Emitting Bacteria That Chew Through Walls May Combat Malaria New research has found that a virus-fighting bacterium can "chew" its way through walls using a powerful enzyme that releases sugars, powering itself as it goes. This could eventually help scientists develop a new generation of pharmaceuticals to treat a wide range of diseases, including malaria, in which parasites attack and destroy red blood cells. Positron Emission Tomography or PET imaging of the non-radioactive glucose metabolism in bacteria to track their progress is how this bacteria are able to "eat" their way through the body without being detected and killed by the immune system. The bacteria, known as Listeria monocytogenes, is known to target the brain and the placenta, but the enzyme that allows them to do this, known as gluconate sodium channel, or GcSC, opens up new avenues for researchers to battle diseases. "The area that we have looked at is Listeria, because we know that it is a very good drug-delivery vehicle and that it can penetrate into the brain," said Chris Murphy, a biological materials engineer at Stanford University and a co-author of a paper describing the research published in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences. "We wanted to find a way to get this bacterium to both travel faster and for longer periods of time than we have been able to with other vehicles," Murphy told TechNewsDaily. "However, to do so we have to figure out how to slow it down. We are seeking to create a nano-material that will bind to and slow it down to create an e79caf774b
