This feature will allow developers to be able to send push notifications to users in a quick and painless manner. To do this, it will let developers specify a new scoped channel to be used for sending push notifications, and an action to be taken when a user receives a notification. We believe that this will be a great way for developers to communicate updates to users on their websites and apps and for users to quickly and painlessly receive important updates to their apps. This feature, as you can see in the GIF below, will allow you to quickly add a button to your web app's UI that a user can click to receive updates. A key benefit of this feature is that it will be implemented inside of our C# SDK, so developers will be able to send updates to their users in a way that fits with their app's flow and user interface. One Click Web Push As mentioned above, the developer API will handle the passing of the token for the scoped channel that the user can opt into. Developers will be able to specify which channel the user would like to receive push messages from. This is shown in the image below. After the channel has been specified, users will be able to quickly select to send push messages through the app. When a user opts into a channel, we will generate a token in the usual way and pass this token to the user's app. The
