By Bill Van Auken 17 February, 2015 CounterPunch Last week, the University of Virginia School of Medicine announced that it had completed testing and then medical trials of a form of medical marijuana derived from cannabis and designed to alleviate pain and muscle spasms caused by a variety of neurological disorders, such as multiple sclerosis, but particularly Parkinson's disease, a progressive neurodegenerative disease that, according to the American Parkinson Disease Association, affects close to 1 million Americans. The subjects were in all, as the university explained, "experienced anxiety and depression." The university cited the potential usefulness of medical marijuana, "which has been shown to have positive effects on pain and spasticity." The project, led by a faculty member of the school's Department of Neurology, Dr. Geoffrey Guy, Ir., began in 2013 and involves the use of tetrahydrocannabinol, or THC, a psychoactive component of marijuana that provides users with the sense of high. The university said the study was
