High-school achievement gap unlikely among students whose families live in lowpoverty areas — Harvard Study Results Published Thursday, Nov. 1, 2012 | 9:09 p.m. Reducing the achievement gap between privileged students and their moreeconomically disadvantaged peers is a top priority of the nation's policymakers, educators and philanthropists. But evidence is increasingly showing that a well-off family's economic clout isn't the only factor that determines its children's prospects. Among students whose families live in low-poverty areas, levels of family income and parental education have little bearing on high-school grades. In fact, a student with a well-off family who lives in a low-poverty area is more likely to end up in a low-income group than a well-off student whose family lives in a high-poverty area. These findings are the result of a new study published Thursday in the Harvard Educational Review, which examines the depth of the achievement gap, and the role that socioeconomic status plays in a student's academic performance. For decades, experts have speculated that the achievement gap between high- and low-achieving students — who are particularly prevalent at some urban schools results from the fact that low-income students have less access to resources than their wealthier peers, and that more-advantaged students have a head start with regard to learning. The new study adds a new layer to that knowledge: Wealthy students' performance
