Age-related differences in thiamine-induced localization of <sup>35</sup>S-methionine in the rat brain. Rats of different ages (young, middle-aged and old) were injected with a small (100 mg/kg) or large (800 mg/kg) dose of [<sup>35</sup>S]methionine and were killed 1 h later. In both dosage groups, old animals showed a lower degree of labeling in brain tissue than did young animals, whereas middle-aged animals did not show the age-related reduction. [<sup>35</sup>S]Thiamine autoradiograms also showed fewer silver grains in the brain of middle-aged rats and even fewer in old animals. It is concluded that the age-related effect in the rat brain can be attributed to a reduction in methionine uptake.Pages Thursday, February 9, 2009 In memoriam: Sean Dunne I'm very sad to announce the passing of comic book artist Sean Dunne. I'd known Sean for a while, but I really got to know him last year through another comic artist, Fiona Staples, who was drawing three issues of a series called Chew. This became our project together, which we named "Chew and Cheese," from which a novella will be released. Fiona has been opening up the world of comic books to me, so I'm very grateful. After our project ended, Sean and I teamed up with writer Jamie Rich for a two issue mini-series called "The Primitives," which was about ancient humans surviving in a world that was not their own, a survival of humanity but without the guile or the complications we expect from humans. Sean and Jamie were a great team, and the book was hilarious. I've never met an artist like Sean before--he was full of ideas and never satisfied with the end product. He had a knack for mixing realistic visuals with the absurd, but it was always his sense of humor that made the book soar off the page. I think he might have turned some of my readers off, but that's okay. The world is a better place for Sean's presence.Voter ID laws are the focus of fierce political debate in states across the U.S. But are they actually effective in ensuring that only qualified voters are participating in elections? Not really. The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) released a report Thursday, which outlines the problems with voter fraud, and proposes solutions.

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac are betting on blockchain technology to move away from the old style of credit scoring. In May, Fannie Mae announced a partnership with Chain, a blockchain start-up founded by Michael O'Hare and Dimitrios Skaltsis, to create a "shared ledger" that gives consumers more access to information. Nasdaq is also working with Australia's technology company Datum on a blockchain-based tool that can be used to identify fraudulent financial services accounts. In the U.S., the announcement was met with a mixed reception, with some commentators applauding the blockchain concept as a long overdue innovation in the credit industry while others questioned whether it was too early to be implementing blockchain technology for credit scoring. A lot of blockchain startups do not have an end use for their digital currency or token offering. That said, their early days in the bear market meant that companies in this space did not have the capital to spend on marketing or on establishing brand awareness. Most blockchain projects do not have the security infrastructure in place to handle the volume of transactions that can be generated by a single user. It's a problem that several companies are trying to solve. "At this point, I don't think we have a good sense of the users we are going to see on the platform as we move through the growing pains of initial adoption," said Jenny Choi, a vice president in Fannie Mae's Private Markets Group, in an interview with CNBC. Fannie Mae, a government-sponsored enterprise, is in the mortgage business and provides loans to consumer, business, government and other organizations. "We view the shared ledger technology as more of an enabler on the back end," she said. Blockchain, the technology behind bitcoin and other cryptocurrencies, works on a peer-to-peer distributed network. This means that it's not controlled by any entity, which in this case means that individual users would be able to see and have access to information. It would be similar to a private messaging platform like WhatsApp or Facebook Messenger, but a private, secure platform designed for sharing financial data and information. Many people have a positive view of blockchain, as it changes the power structure of the financial services and banking industry and provides transparency into the products that banks and other financial institutions offer. Blockchain is also used to cut costs, as it can help streamline internal processes. How it works F
