The new engine features also include "Next-Gen Player Interaction" improvements, bringing a new physics model to all aspects of the play, improved animation controls and a brand-new match engine.

The best looking football game is also now compatible with Microsoft's blockbuster next-generation console, the Xbox One X and PlayStation 4 Pro. "With FIFA 22, we set out to redefine football gaming in all its forms by focusing on the game's visual quality," said David Rutter, Head of FIFA, EA Sports. "By marrying the best in motion capture technology with the power of the Frostbite engine, we've been able to bring the game to a new level of realism and create the most authentic football experience ever. In FIFA, we strive to deliver an incredible gaming experience that immerses the gamer into the world of football and this year, we've pushed the boundaries even further with our most realistic graphics ever, alongside state-of-the-art animation and physics. Our focus on improvements to the game's AI and match engine has also helped make this year's FIFA the best FIFA yet." FIFA 22 is available on PlayStation 4, Xbox One and PC and will be released on March 2.Q: What should I do with a question that is already answered on Stack Overflow? Recently, a question that is already answered on Stack Overflow is posted on GAS Community for a bunch of (technical) reasons. Most of the time, the question gets down-voted and closed as a duplicate. What's the correct thing to do with a question that is already answered? It's pretty clear to me that the question doesn't belong on GAS Community. How to best follow-up with the OP who put this question there? If they just leave it alone, it's a dead question. Closing as a duplicate is usually the right thing to do. Down-voting and closing as a duplicate seems the most logical approach. Yet, it seems the OP gets hurt somehow by all this. Is it even logical to down-vote a question if it's already answered on Stack Overflow? I down-voted the question that is already answered on Stack Overflow (the title of this question is my example). How to handle this situation? A: Well, I'm not sure if it's your question, but this sounds like a duplicate

Features: Triple Size Play Take your skills, skill moves and favourite balls into the biggest games of FIFA 22 with the options of three-way pitch sizes Commentary in English and Spanish Read the lips of your favourite commentators as you hear them reflect on every game actionQ: Firebase change email of gmail users I have a question about Firebase and Gmail. I would like to change the email of users who have email in gmail. They log in to my app by gmail login. How can I change the email that the user is associated with when they log in to the app? Or can I filter the users in google console? Any idea how to do this? A: You can change a user's email in Firebase Auth using the Email/Password method: `mAuth.updateEmailAndPassword(email, password)` Q: Is a timestamp a powerful enough security feature to protect sensitive data? The data I'm looking for, for example, is very public and available to other apps on my device. Is there any security feature in Android that would be able to protect it, or is it only capable of protecting data that is available in places that are secret to other apps? A: A Timestamp is just a number and can be generated by any program. How secure it is depends on the algorithm being used (a very good blog article from Martin Roesch about this topic, timestamp security) and the possible risks. The risks are: Man in the Middle: if the timestamp is not provided by a verified party, any third party with access to your network can read it. Retention: if an attacker has access to your timestamps, what access does he have to the data? And for how long? Data Breaches: If the attacker can record or permanently read all your timestamps, then it doesn't
