This means that despite the fact that the game is designed for artificial intelligence to analyse and predict outcomes using machine learning, the physics, artificial intelligence and animations are all dynamically linked to the player data on the pitch, allowing the game to react to the players and the tactics of the opposition. The depth of the player data is impressive, and the impact that this real-time feedback has had on the game has been remarkable. The game creators have given us all here the power to control everything that happens on the pitch. The 'Touch' system is probably what most people think of when they hear about FIFA esports, and it features here too, but apart from a nice augmented reality training mode, we don't know of any other substantial uses of it in-game. It seems to be best at showing off exactly where you've shot your ball and you can have a look here: It's a shame that the use of this sort of game mechanic in FIFA esports doesn't seem to be taking off. Perhaps something similar to the new "Touch" feature could be utilised in League or Overwatch, which don't have the depth of player data that FIFA has. Full Controller Guidance Kit (GCK) The new FCGK changes FIFA's core game mechanics in two key ways. Firstly it adds a series of input options to FIFA Ultimate Team, allowing you to simulate the exact movements of each player in real-time, while also allowing you to change formations and move them up or down the pitch. These changes are immediately reflected in game-play. The second thing the GCK does is to more closely link the interface to the game, allowing players to utilise their movements in games much more naturally. For example, the "S" button will allow you to dive and tackle. The "A" button will allow you to skip an attempt at a pass, and the
