In an example, the PFC circuit may be designed to increase power factor correction for a boost converter having a diode rectifier and to decrease power factor correction for a buck converter having a single-diode rectifier. existing Spring MVC application for Batch monitoring as well as job dispatching. The Job dispatching is done using Spring Batch API. So I have two questions: 1) How can I access the data from the MySQL database using Spring Batch Admin? 2) Is there a need to create tables in MySQL for the job data? I just need to add and edit the steps and jobs. A: So to answer your questions: Yes, there are different methods to access your data in Spring Batch Admin. I do not know which the best is, but I use the one from Spring Batch Javadocs. It is probably also not the best method, but it's a convenient solution. Yes, you have to create tables in MySQL for the job data, that means adding an entry for every jobs and steps to your tables. So for your example this means: A Job table A Step table A JobData table But you can use the Spring Batch Admin in Spring Boot if you don't want to create tables for your data by hand. It also provides a web interface to the database where you can add/edit/deactivate/activate steps and jobs. Q: Loop through multi-dimensional array to check if array value equals a user input I am trying to create a function that allows the user to enter an address (string) and then determines if that address is in a multi-dimensional array, however I am struggling to work out the best way to code this. I am working in a.net 4.0 application using C# 4.0. I need to be able to loop through all of the values of an array, and then check if a string input matches a value within that array. I have this so far: private bool CheckAddress(string input) { bool found = false; foreach (Addresses myAddresses in addresses) {
