Experiments are planned to collect the tetanus toxoid-specific cells and to determine their functional capabilities. The analysis will include: number and frequency of antigen-specific cells, change in phenotype during the course of the response, characteristics of antigen-specific suppressor cells, and sensitivity to T cell-mediated cytotoxicity. Once recovered, the cells will be characterized by the following means: antigen binding, specificity of proliferative response and antigen-induced interleukin-2 production. The analysis will allow us to determine if they are tetanus toxoid-specific long-lived T lymphocytes and, if so, to determine if they are similar in their characteristics and function to those developed in the patients after immunization with
