Cocaine addiction is characterized by behavioral sensitization, which is reflected by reduced locomotor responsiveness in the absence of sensitized behavioral responses to the psychostimulant. Repeated administration of cocaine to rats initially leads to sensitization of locomotor activity. Daily injections of cocaine for 14 days decreases cell proliferation in the ventral tegmental area, but has no effect on the proliferation of dopamine-synthesizing cells in the substantia nigra. In contrast, a single injection of a marked emetic agent leads to proliferation of both these cell types.
