Reversible thermal behavior of CdSe nanocrystals under hyperthermia. The thermal stability of CdSe nanocrystals (NCs) under hyperthermia was studied using two optical micro-spectroscopy methods, one based on the temperature-dependent dichroism of solution-phase NCs, and the other on the temperature-dependent red-shift and linewidth of NC emission. The temperature-dependent absorption spectra showed that the nanocrystals transformed from an absorbing solution into an emissive state at 63 and 82 degrees C, respectively, with the appearance of an absorption peak at 628 nm. Under hyperthermia (45 degrees C), the NCs absorbed in the initial non-emissive state of the NCs were essentially "frozen". However, after a short period of heating, the NCs changed to an emissive state. The NCs were returned to a non-emissive state at 37 degrees C, suggesting that the thermal behavior of NCs was reversible. These results suggest that the thermal behavior of NCs should be considered when designing thermal therapy protocols.

I am super stoked about my new credit card. I am a big geek who is super handy with computers. I built my own computer from scratch and have it pretty much just sitting in the corner doing nothing. My latest project was to switch my current credit card over to a new one. The former credit card was abused by myself. However, because the card was under $10K the bank still gave me the $30K credit limit, and I used it all. About a month later I wanted to transfer the balance over to a new card because I knew they would look at me with a suspicious eye. The new credit card company was a bit more exacting about the card and they wanted a couple of months before we could charge. So I started shopping around, and the new card issuer was not nearly as bad as my original credit card company, which I had recently shopped around from. This particular card issuer
