What's new in Cute Snake:

RotoBaller Tremendous breakthroughs in fantasy baseball statistics have been made in the last decade. One of the most significant was the development of Win Shares. Many people have questioned the wisdom of adding batting average to the list of stats one should calculate in one's pitching statistics. Anyone with half a brain knows that batting average adds zero meaningful information, but Win Shares does a much better job of gauging a player's actual value in-season and over the course of a career. Well Win Shares didn't sweep the sports world. Fans still kept screaming, "Why do you need Batting Average?" after the decision to add Weighted Runs Created stat to the equation was announced. Not everyone can see the beauty of adding runs. We are believers. Fans of fantasy baseball spend an inordinate amount of time wondering about the idea of WAR. One example of fan discomfort with the information is the popular agreement to remove batting average from the equation. The intent of the change was to make WAR a more accurate measurement of a player's seasons and lifetime value, but it lost a lot of adherents. What happens when you remove batting average from the equation? That's right, you lose great players from the equation. This is not a developed idea at this point. Most of us are just trying to add more information to our game. We are gradually changing everything. How about pitching? We developed WARP by the SABR guys. This is the math turned into a simple stat. Let's let pitcher WARP be the ultimate stat. To keep this short: WARP is calculated by adding all the accomplishments of a pitcher's career. Add pitching wins to their pitching stats, batting average to their hitting stats, and ERA to their batting stats. Give pitchers 1 run for a win, 1.5 runs for a hit, 1 run for an out, and then 2 runs for a hit of which there are 9 per game. The idea is that pitchers, like hitters, perform at their abilities over a full season. Why bother? There are many reasons to believe that this approach is significantly more accurate than relying on any one stat for fantasy purposes. After all, most stats have their limits. A player's fantasy value may be greater than his performance actually. The question becomes: does a better stat than batting average reveal a player who may perform better than he is being given credit for his value? That is the question. Here we are. We are at the hard part. Tr
