What's new in Hellsinker.:

fc?rel=0#ion=0> is a hoax. CNN reported that he and his contacts said the site could be altered by someone with "dirty web skills." But the features at RwdLfc's site closely match those at other sites visited by ID Seeker readers. CNN has not responded to requests for comment. I've been told that researchers can't find any evidence that Steven Voight existed, that the site was part of a hoax by Voight and his contacts (see above), and that there were simply a large number of hoaxes out there on the subject. The IDS is a monolithic monster and is unlikely to be affected by researchers' finding no evidence that Voight ever existed. But we clearly do need to understand whether such results apply to the individual sites in the Index. The IDS website appears to be providing a basic service: this site publicizes an ever-growing list of documents that purport to be scientific reports backing the notion that the world was created recently--backed by a Gish gallop of often very ridiculous ideas. If Steven Voight and his ghostwriters never existed (and were never posting the propaganda), then perhaps there is a user-generated document problem in the Index. Moreover, the Index may be presented as a list of documents created over time that are not-too-greatly representative of the topic at hand. But from the perspective of ID speakers and promoters, it is irrelevant how many such documents are out there; they only look at one document, the Chilobody IDS, and claim that there is incontrovertible evidence for their view. In other words, from the perspective of ID performers, the view of the scientific establishment is easily swept aside simply by adding another document to the list. The entire notion of public science seems silly, thanks to the ID thesis. So even though it seems unlikely that any documents that Voight posted for the purpose of promoting the "young earth" hypothesis will be scrutinized by researchers, we do need to find out for certain. If the IDS doesn't hold up, we need to know the reasons why it doesn't. We need research by credible researchers into whether the documents really represent the views of the purported authors. Meanwhile, even if the IDS continues
