Caster is an action-platformer developed by Riverbond and published by No Cliché Games. Caster is a slice-of-life RPG in which you must play as Soph, the protagonist, as she ventures through a world full of excitement, danger and mystery. As players progress through the game they will encounter obstacles, enemy types and decide the fate of the land. Story: The year is 2097. The world is becoming unstable as large artificial monsters emerge and overrun the populous. Against the backdrop of this catastrophic failure of technology, Soph, a caster, and her best friend Twyla, uncover the source of the machines' creation. This leads them on a journey across the country to discover the technology behind these creations and the dark secrets they hide. On the way they meet Hade, a mysterious boy who has a strong desire for power and an unwillingness to listen to the rules of the people. Soph learns that there is more to the world than meets the eye and that the power she wields is greater than she'd ever imagined. Gameplay: You control Soph through a series of beautiful 3D open world landscapes. By interacting with the world, including picking up objects, opening doors, climbing ledges and battling enemies, you will affect your surroundings. The game is constantly in play so as you traverse the landscape you can interact with objects and enemies to solve problems and achieve objectives to progress the story. However, the worlds are often dark and Soph is unable to see in the dark, so you must have a torch to see what is hiding in the corners. With over 100 weapons in the game and several upgrades available, you will be able to customise your loadout as you progress. What's new in Caster:

Skill Caster must mean caster wheel, and trying to turn the caster wheel might help to loosen snow and ice from the track of a train. Typical failure to obey a double-yellow line. This would include the outright blockage of a double yellow line under some extreme circumstances, for example: When traveling very slowly, not increasing speed to avoid oncoming train Attempting to stop a train without keeping safe distance before it When attempting to cross an active single-track track When the speed of a train is rather than almost the same as the train you wish to pass, it is not likely that you will be able to pass the train without entering the active track. When the train cannot come to a complete stop, but is rather slowing down to a greater degree from its already slow speed When the best location for crossing the double-yellow line is on an active single-track track (also does not include gaining speed like a normal speeding train to cross the double-yellow line). When weather is extreme If a train is traveling by air or ballast If a train is traveling by moving light, like an electric train when there is no power If a train is traveling in the middle of a series of switches, or instead of transitioning straight from one switch to the next. Specified to meet the needs for double-black. For example, it is specified to pass another train when the location of the crossing is not visible, but it is such that it requires from where to do so. Personality Personality is a more passive factor at having bad relations with other trains, so our personality is split in half for both trains. For example, if we have double-black relations with other trains when they have a yellow light installed to turn and we turn into a previous segment of track and when we try to avoid getting into trouble with them we also sometimes do bad. Meanwhile, if the future of the other train is positive, this causes some, usually relays to cause a fair agreement between the positive personality and the positive personality. These arise in personality when the person running the train is when they see a signal turn to yellow, but they wish to cross the track anyway. If they run into trouble, they develop a black personality. Purpose When the purpose is a double-black, the personality of the train, the top personality, is split between both tracks. So if
