How to restore factory settings to my pcQ: How to avoid "box filtering" and "shooting yourself in the foot" in outdoor shots? Often, I see outdoor pictures with lots of distracting objects in the photo, e.g. on the borders of the photo or hanging from the branches of a tree. The objects are often distracting - the sky is a pretty sky and the wind is whipping and the leaves are ruffling, but what draws my attention is the branches of a tree, the building, the sky, some grass or the sun. My usual approach is to try and zoom to the point where it's not annoying to look at,

put the meter at around f16 and hope for the best. Sometimes this works - in other cases I end up with a slightly or greatly cropped image with tons of distracting "stuff" in it. How can I avoid this? A: Don't just zoom to F16. Instead, take your picture. The best results usually come from carefully thinking about composition and posing your subject to allow the most dramatic expression from it. This means thinking ahead to how the actual composition will be adjusted in post-processing. Don't do so much post-processing that you are inclined to crop the photo back
