High-school students with hyperhidrosis were treated with either (a) conventional treatment with topical antiperspirant plus desipramine, or (b) a health education program conducted over a 10-week period. Throughout this period, subjects recorded daily information about skin condition and how it related to their academic schedule. Personal and social data were gathered at the beginning and end of this period. Interval-time analysis showed that those subjects in the health-education program experienced less worsening of their skin condition and a greater increase in self-confidence than those in the treatment group. Improvements in skin condition and self-confidence persisted into the next school year. These data provide further support for the effectiveness of health education as an adjunct to conventional treatment in controlling hyperhidrosis.Q: Access VBA get data from fields in a query I have the following query which I execute to get the data I want from my SQL database.
