Fluidized bed steam boilers (FBs) have much in common with fixed bed boilers. Fixed bed boilers and fluidized bed boilers have different designs, but both burn solid and liquid fuels. In any case, the boiler consists of a horizontal steel (or cast-iron pipes) drum, in which there are burners, that is, a chamber where fuel is burned. The boiler also contains channels through which water is drained and supplied to the boilers, as well as a vaporizing medium, in this case water.

The purpose of the present study was to measure aldehyde levels in saliva and correlate these with levels in blood. We measured aldehyde levels in saliva (A) and blood (B) in patients suffering from various neurological diseases, including Parkinson's disease (PD), to determine if a correlation exists between these two diagnostic tools for neurological disorders. Biochemical investigations of the patient group included a complete neurological examination and a central nervous system (CNS) diagnostic. Our results showed that in most of the cases, A was elevated and B was normal or only slightly elevated. In PD, A was not elevated, while B was. As a result, salivary A could serve as a diagnostic marker for neurological disorders. An increase in A concentration in saliva is associated with Parkinson's disease.Extended duty times on operating room equipment. This study evaluates the life expectancy of common operating room machines for different medical specialties. The average duty cycle in a normal surgical day was compared with an extended duty cycle, which is used by trainees or novices. Two types of machines were tested: laminating machine (20 machines) and the video camera (7 machines). For each machine, the average duty cycles were determined and then compared with extended duty cycles. The use of extended duty cycles improved the performance of the machines tested, yielding increased machine life and decreased power consumption. The type of machine used was not found to affect the results. Extended duty cycles improve the performance of operating room machines. The use of extended duty cycles should be considered by manufacturers of new operating room machines.Effect of solvents, surfactant addition and contact time on nitric acid recovery by different flotation reagents. The recoveries of nitric acid and other substances by froth flotation were studied in different solvents with and without surfactant, and under different contact times. The recovered mass of nitric acid was higher in ethanol and acetone than in toluene and chloroform. The addition of Tween 80 as a surfactant was found to enhance the recovery of nitric acid.
