Arts & Entertainment As a newspaper readership becomes increasingly remote, local television stations are switching to a new breed of paid sponsorships to reach local audiences. A new crop of regional channels on cable and satellite systems are already snapping up some of the marquee names in brand partnerships. "What we are seeing is the emerging market in advertising with locally based sponsorships in that we have more opportunities now to take advantage of the fact that consumers are more captive in-market than they are out-of-market," said David Letterman, a longtime ad sales executive who helps local TV stations woo sponsors. "The local economy has picked up since the recession." That opens up ample room for TV stations to sell the kinds of multi-million-dollar assets like naming rights on the Super Bowl or in-studio billboards for college sports programs. The kind of sponsorships Letterman is talking about can include ad buys for as little as $20,000 per 30-second spot to lend a hand in the local community, said Julie Miller, director of research at Local Market Insights, a market research firm in Denver. "That's not exactly big ticket money, but what it does is get a brand in front of the eyeballs of a large audience," she said. "Local is kind of a throwback to what advertising was at the turn of the century." Twelve of the most prominent regional cable channels, which cater to hard-to-reach audiences in upstate New York, Mississippi, Texas, Illinois and Alabama, are expecting to have some kind of property deal in place for a new TV season, which starts in mid-August, according to the Local Market Insights report. This is not the first time regional TV stations have been flipping for products. For years, some local TV stations in smaller markets -- including those in Denver, Miami and St. Louis
